Encouraging engineering, business, economics, graphic design majors, etc. to come together and create companies. Stanford does this and the develop so many entrepreneurs. TCU doesn't encourage students of other majors to work together and start companies. This should have been set up a long time ago. We now have a student-run venture capital fund that has money available for students, but there is a shortage of students with good ideas and different educational backgrounds.

A lot of students feel they need to choose a traditional route of a large corporation that will train them to work for them in their certain way. They barely learn skills that diversify them for the changing workforce outside of that company. Many of these students aren't differentiated enough/valuable enough to keep jobs at large corporations. Working for startups and international companies teaches you skills and freedom to develop your own talents that you don't get at large corporations.
